In the first story in this collection, a father comes back from the dead in order to save his son. But fathers are unpredictable; they influence their children in all sorts of ways. Another father haunts his daughter into the grave. A pseudo-father makes a terrible mess of things and sons and daughters fail, spectacularly, to form relationships. One man's ghost may seem disconcertingly present but the men and women in this collection seem to be no more than ghosts to one another. The stories here show that, often, one is never more heart - more root and more rooted in one's past - than in affairs of the heart.
